

START HERE

Does what you have already done still count?

Before a career pivot, internal move, or other change in context, ask four questions.

Some of it does. Let's get precise about what.

Your experience does not all travel.

It does not all disappear either.

The work is to tell the difference.

What travels?

Judgment you have exercised.

Patterns you have learned to recognize.

Ways of solving problems you have already demonstrated.

These can remain useful when the employer, function, industry, or role changes.

What does not?

Company-specific systems.

Relationship-based access and influence.

Internal language.

Assumptions that made you effective there but may mean little somewhere else.

Some experience is context-bound.

What can you prove?

The next context cannot see your internal reputation.

It needs evidence another person can understand and trust.

What must you relearn?

A new context brings different technical requirements, language, and constraints.

Being capable of learning them is not the same as already knowing them.

Adjacent experience is not automatic qualification.

Your job is not to pretend the gap does not exist.

Make your experience clear enough for the next context to judge the gap accurately.

Your experience does not all travel. It does not all disappear either.

On LinkedIn, I write about what travels, what does not, what you can prove, and what you must relearn when the context changes.

Follow for clear ways to decide what still counts
before a career pivot or internal move.